Dear Harold,

You probably saw this interview with Oliver Stone, but I thought I'd send it just in case you missed it. It's a shame the film focuses on the Garrison investigation, but it sounds like it should be quite provocative, nevertheless. I suppose it's possible that the film will lead to demands for another government investigation of the assassination, but given the attention span of the American public, and the fact that a former CIA director is in the White House, I'm not getting my hopes too high.

I also want to thank you for getting me the four books I ordered. (I'm certainly glad I already owned the original "Whitewash" and "Oswald in New Orleans.") They were every bit as good as I expected. The only problem is that they are so packed with fascinating information that they will each require at least one rereading before I can begin to absorb all their content.

The five-part series "The Men Who Killed Kennedy" recently aired on the Arts and Entertainment cable TV station here in Chicago. Although there is much to praise in this work, the highlight for me were your all-too-brief appearances.

Your statement at the conclusion of the final segment was eloquent, moving, and should awaken all who view these programs to the importance of the continuing investigation of the assassination. If you can't do this, then who among us can?

Admiringly,

Dan Weisberg
